(From the Daily Louisville Times.) Sketch No. 8. AN OLD WOMANS' STORY.

The evening was a gloomy one. The sun was recading in stormy eplender behind the distant mountains. The wind arose in fitful gusts, and in mournful eadences swept through the leafless forest

The drifts of snow, brought into bold relief by the sombre sides of the moun taine, did not brighten the scene, but served to render it cold and cheerless. Man and heast had sheltered themselves from the undefined terror of the approaching night.

The last rays of the departing oun poured a flood of lurid light through the crimson damask silk curtains of the window, and lighted up the features of en aged femule, who shut the volume in which she had been reading, and gased intently upon its closed lid. The increasing darkness switch to the she had been reading, and gased intently upon its closed lid. ing darkness served to give a gloomier aspect to the dim and antiquated fural-ture of the large room. A casual observer might have perceived that she was troubled in mind, from tha tightly compressed mouth, and the air of sterness with which she regarded the book. She pressed mouth, and the air of sterness with which she regarded the book. She arose, and turning to the chair upon which she had been sitting, lifted a cushion discovering a drawer akillfully concealed in the bottom. In this she carefully re-placed the volume and laid the chushlon again in its place. A heavy black satin enveloped her attanuated form, seahe bow-ed her head upon her trembling hands over the quaint chair. My sister, ohl my sister, thy suffering must I again endure in relating thy life to another. But I must not shrink from the task, if it will save Annie from a similar fate,'-and in a stern suppressed tone continued, 'com--revenge.

She walked slowly across the apartment and rang a small silver bell. Almost im-medintely a door opened and a smiling-young girl looked in.

It has been asserted that selfathers is the main surjuy of contexts let a selfather. the main spring of society—it le selfshness which protect us from oppression or starvation, but it should extend no farther. It was about a year previous to her death, that I attempted to persoide har to leave home—for I had discersment snough to perceive she was wasting her existence from sheer ennul. His smile was wanting to cheer her on to exacting. Being purely domestic—I any purely, for her allictions were centered en home alone—no worldly feeling alloyed; her nature. Her husbaud's smile would have been a sullicieut stimulus. But he was so engrossed by his own pursuits, a the main spring of society—It le selfishhave been a sulficient stimulus. But he was so engressed by his own pursuits, a thought, was never bestowed on her. I can safely say not a particle of affection or thought he bestowed upon lier, save as convenience in his domiell, which might conduce to his comfort. When I mentioned the plan of leaving home, sharsmiled and said it would be delightful; then, efter a moment's reflection, said I fear Col. Blanton will not concent."

Consentl no, I suppose not. Cen's you go without his consent? and now, Mildred Blanton, as I have broached the subject, I will speak my mind. It is time, God knows. Your health requires will I not do, doar Madam? Lot me assist you to your chamber.

'Nay, Annie, I will take tea in here this evening. The weather is so boisterous, our expected guests, Col. Blanton ous, our expected guessiand his son, will neither venture. Have the outer doors fastened, and order supper at once.' Tha two ladies sat opposite—each a heautiful epecimen of the ago they had attained. The aldar one tail and commanding—stern and dignified; yet the beam of affection which played or over her features as she regarded the young girl, redeem them from harshmess. And Anuic knew from the tone of her awooning, such nothing but the great effort she made to conquer har feelings, that I might not know the extent of her misery, sustained her. In a short time inter this conversation, Col. The widow had then £700 a year jointure, but his lordship, the guar-dian of the property, unde her an ullow-acc of £1,500 a year; and the court, acting on the security of this nobleman of high rank, granted her a mansion and demense rout free, and £600 to furnish it So the necessaries and comforts of the three young ladies were at least provided for. Again hear the Atsorney General: The would state positively that during the time they resided in the mansion, a more abject state of misery than those young ladies were kept in he hardly remembered ever to have read of. He could not but apprehend that their early and premature deaths were owing to the manner in which they were treated, and he trusted in God they were not so treated designedly.

During this time the boy called John De-lacour here, but who went by an euphofactor here, but who went by an supho-nious name, and one to which, perhaps, he has as good a title—John de Burgh— was living in the house. Instead of be-ing treated as the unimppy daughters were, this unlopted son was included, it ap-peared in the evidence that they [the daughters] were obliged to perform even mennal services for him; and it would who had pre deceased her, certain judg— Peared in the evidence that they [the ments entered up by one of them, Jose— planed in the evidence that they [the ments entered up by one of them, Jose— planed in the evidence that they [the ments entered up by one of them, Jose— planed in the evidence that they [the ments entered up by her will, would have the effect of the estates and vesting them in the respondent Delactour, a natural son of the mother of these young ladius, a minor. It appears that a certain Miss Eliza Josephine Kelly was a great heauty, and also a very ambitious and designing woman; and it was ulledged that she, with the assistance of Lord Claricards, tormed the project of allylug herself to Mr. Handcock, a gentleman of considerable uponalso, that her person was offensive-that she was rotten; and, to account for the existence of young Delacour, she states it were hetter that they had never been been. Their short said history is one unbroken tale of misery and persecution. Told even in the cold language of the chancery lawyer, it makes the blood, run cold, and we would not pain our readers by its reproduction if we did not believe it a duty we owe to society. From 1828-to 1840 there were no further children.
